"The most important thing a father can do for his children is to love their mother."
—Theodore Hesburgh

Why Bother With Fathers?

For some reason, the Kardashians—the high-powered Los Angeles family that is famous because it is famous—came up at the dinner table not long ago. A mild disagreement ensued over who was the father of which sister's illegitimate child. For those who keep up with such things in the grocery store checkout line—the scandal sheets, as my mother-in-law quaintly called them—it may be simple, but for those of us who really could not care less, a scorecard is required.

We solved the problem, as most people do these days, with a quick check of a pertinent source of such news on the Internet. All the ins and outs of that family's multitudinous marriages and liaisons—and the children that sprang from them—are enough to make one's head spin. What unfortunately immediately came to my mind—totally unbidden—was the thought of a horse pedigree: "Secretariat, son of Bold Ruler, out of Somethingroyal."

It was one of those instant associations that often provide insight—if not only to one's own mental state—to the world as it really is. First impressions can be frequently spot on because they are flash evaluations uncolored by subsequent rationalizations, also known as second guesses. At that moment, a person sees things as they are presented right then. In this case, that so many Americans live in yours-mine-and-ours households—not to mention single-parent households due to the dual family scourges of illegitimacy and divorce—is fleetingly reminiscent of the temporary liaisons between studs and broodmares.

While this may seem offensive, it has biblical precedent, believe it or not. In Jeremiah 13:27, God castigates Judah, particularly the royal family: "I have seen your adulteries and your lustful neighing, the lewdness of your harlotry, your abominations on the hills in the fields. Woe to you, O Jerusalem! Will you still not be made clean?" Jeremiah seems fond of this image, as he uses it again in Jeremiah 5:8: "They were like well-fed lusty stallions; every one neighed after his neighbor's wife." Clearly, God is portraying people—who should know better—following their base drives like brute animals.

As steeped in Judeo-Christian values as it is, America is a nation that should know better, yet for at least three generations, the sanctity of marriage has steadily declined among its people until today, when divorce is routine and illegitimacy is commonplace. Back in my grandfather's day, divorce was still shameful, and most families did not want their sons or daughters to marry a divorced person. However, as society secularized, divorce lost its stigma until no-fault divorce laws swept across the nation.

According to the Centers for Disease Control, 20% of marriages are disrupted after five years and about one-third of marriages after ten years. As of 2020, the current divorce rate is 2.3 per 1,000 population, while the marriage rate is 5.1 per 1,000, meaning that just under half of marriages end in divorce. (This 2020 divorce rate does not include statistics from California, Hawaii, Indiana, Minnesota, and New Mexico, so it is actually higher than it appears.)

Further, only in six states—Hawaii, Illinois, Mississippi, New Mexico, North Carolina, South Dakota, and Utah—can someone sue for damages on the basis of alienation of affection in cases of adultery. Most states have recognized that adultery is so commonplace today that a person entering a marriage should expect it to be corrupted by an outside sexual liaison. Caveat emptor now applies to the marriage transaction too.
Another worrying trend is that of women opting for single-motherhood. It is bad enough when women in their late thirties or early forties, seeing their window of childbearing closing fast, decide to have a child without the benefit of marriage (a category that has nearly doubled since 1980). But it is far worse when young women begin to make the same "lifestyle choice" in their early-to-mid twenties. These days, over 40% of live births in this nation are to single mothers, and in about half of these cases, the mothers are entirely on their own. How many of these young mothers are single mothers by choice is difficult to quantify, but a September 17, 2008, article in The Guardian (U.K.) reports that, there as in this country, "a growing number of young women are now turning to artificial insemination and embracing single motherhood." Since then, the social climate has only become more favorable for women to make that choice.

In all of these situations, the disposable factor seems to be the father. Society's definition of fatherhood seems to be dwindling toward the idea of sperm donation and little more. The father might be replaced—or not, depending on the whim of the mother. As one of the young British women in The Guardian article commented about her daughter, "I think there are some children who grow up perfectly well without male role models—and she has got my father, my brother and my nephew." Who needs a husband and a father? Any man, whatever the relation, will do.

God did not create the family to work this way. He is very clear in Genesis 2:24, "Therefore a man shall leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, and they shall become one flesh." Here, He establishes the marriage relationship as the basis of the family. He declares in Malachi 2:16 that He hates divorce, a statement echoed by Jesus' teaching on divorce in Matthew 19:6-9.

In the seventh commandment, God forbids sexual activity outside of marriage (Exodus 20:14). Later, in such places as Deuteronomy 23:2, He places the stigma on illegitimacy: "One of illegitimate birth shall not enter the assembly of the LORD; even to the tenth generation none of his descendants shall enter the assembly of the LORD." He wanted His people to be a nation of whole families because they produced the best products for the benefit of the nation. It is clear from the situation before the Flood that men taking "wives for themselves of all whom they chose" did not produce a cohesive, peaceful society (Genesis 6:2). It ended in disaster.

This desire for stable families is codified in the fifth of the Ten Commandments: "Honor your father and your mother, that your days may be long upon the land which the LORD your God is giving you" (Exodus 20:12). Like mothers, fathers are a vital part of the equation whose sum is a well-rounded, secure individual. True, not all fathers are good fathers, and God makes provisions for such cases in His principles on divorce, but more often than not, a father in the home creates a better environment for raising children than a home that lacks one. And the more the home's father and mother love each other and expand their love to their children, the better the environment becomes.

Here in the United States, this Sunday is Father's Day. As we honor our fathers and husbands, take a moment to consider their importance to the family and to society. It should heighten our gratitude, not only for our human fathers, but our Father in heaven, who really does know best.

Parenting (Part 2): Fathers
by Richard T. Ritenbaugh

A major part of our spiritual responsibility is to become a parent as God is. The world's society, steeped in evolutionary humanism and feminist polemic, has greatly denigrated the role of the father. Unfortunately, these attitudes, hating anything patriarchal or undemocratic, have seeped into the church. Patriarchy is family organization with the father having ultimate authority. The husband's role, centered in love and concern, should not be abusive, domineering, or authoritarian. He is to provide instruction about God's ways, leadership, guidance, and selfless sacrifice. God-spouse-children is the proper family order of priority. Turning this priority around has fostered the basest of social aberrations in our society.

Father Knows Best
by Mike Ford (1955-2021)

Not long ago, the father was considered the undisputed leader of the family, as depicted in the old TV show, Father Knows Best. How things have changed! Now the role models are predominantly negative, and men are increasingly failing to take responsibility for their offspring. Mike Ford takes a hard look at why this is happening and provides solutions from God's Word.
